Photoreceptors

Photoreceptors are photosensing proteins that respond to the surrounding light environment around. Upon light absorption, photoreceptors can go through large scale conformational changes, which happen via several intermediates over multiple timescales. Many studies have been done, and the study of photoreceptors can characterize the transient structural deformation of a protein environment that propagates and initiates the signal transduction pathways.